Judge Thomas M. Alderson

Judge Thomas Marshall Alderson, son of Colonel Thomas Creigh McCleary Alderson and Nancy Dickerson Alderson, and the 14th commonwealth attorney of Wise County in order of service, descended from one of the oldest and more distinguished families of Virginia. His great grandfather was a barrister in England, having come to Virginia to evade persecution at the hands of Oliver Cromwell. Born 1787-Died 1857 Edward Hall Alderson was Baron of the Exchequer. The Aldersons in Virginia were represented in the House of Burgesses and rendered service during the Revolution, and in the War of 1812, and seceded with Virginia. A cousin of the subject, Hon. John D. Alderson, was a representative in Congress for three terms, from his district in the state of West Virginia. T. C. M. Alderson, father of the subject, and son of Colonel George Alderson, was a Colonel in the Virginia Troops and was born in the County of Greenbriar, now West Virginia, on the 17th day of November, 1817, and died on March 22, 1876, at the age of 59 years past. He first came to Russell County at the age of 14 years, and commenced business in Lebanon as a salesman for Thomas McClary, remaining with him about two years, when he returned to Greenbriar, and attended school for a year or two, and then came back to Russell County at the age of 18 and re-entered the store of Mr. McClary. Within a short time after this, he and Dr. E. D. Kernan purchased the stock of goods of Mr. McClary, and commenced business under the style of Alderson & Kernan. This business was continued for about twenty years. During one period of his life he was postmaster of Lebanon, Virginia. Colonel Alderson was married on the 26th day of September, 1844, to Miss Nancy Dickerson, of Russell County, and resided in Lebanon from that time until his death. He was one of Russell County's most outstanding, wealthy, influential citizens. Judge T. M. Alderson, the subject, was born in Russell County, Virginia on May 7, 1852. He was educated in the Lebanon High School, until he entered Richmond College in October, 1870. He took the collegiate course in two years, and the law course in one year, and graduated and received his diploma as Bachelor of Law, July 1, 1874, taking the faculty medal in the law department. In the same month he was admitted to the bar, after being examined and licensed by Judge Christian Bolen and other members of the Supreme Court of Virginia. In December 1877, he was elected Judge of Russell County, entering upon the duties of the judgeship Jan. 1, 1878. He enjoyed the distinction of being the youngest judge in the state, being at that time only 25 years old. Judge Alderson was a dyed in the wool republican. He was the founder, and editor of the Lebanon News for two years. He resumed the practice of law in Russell and adjoining counties in Sept, 1888, and being local attorney for the C. C. & C. Railroad Company, removed to Dickenson Co., Virginia, locating at Clintwood, looking after the construction of the new railroad through that county. In April 1890, he located at Wise, Wise Co., Virginia. His reputation and standing as a lawyer in Wise county soon grew to such popularity that he built up an excellent practice in his profession. He soon made a host of friends and greatly attached himself to the people of Wise county through his genial manners and social intercourse. His political influence extended throughout Southwest Virginia, and when the time came for a campaign battle, he was always to be found at the post of duty working valiantly for the interest of his party. He was a member of the Virginia Bar Assoc., and served as President of the Bar Association of the 17th Judicial District of Virginia. He was the senior member of the law firm of Alderson & Vicars (O. M. Vicars) in 1889-1890. In 1892, he formed a partnership with Judge William Trigg Miller, under the style of Alderson & Miller, and this partnership existed up until the time of qualification of Judge Miller as judge of the circuit court to succeed Judge H. S. K. Morrison Apr.3,1894, after which, in 1896, he and his son, Tom Gent Alderson, formed a partnership known as Alderson & Alderson, which continued up until the death of his son on May 29,1903. Judge Alderson's activity during the first presidential campaign of William McKinley was first brought into notice with the appointment of the U. S. District Attorney for the Western District of Virginia. He practically abandoned his practice of law to his son and took the stump in behalf of McKinley and the republican congressional nominee from the 9th district, and helped as a result to land a republican congressman, he having himself been urged by the convention at Wytheville to allow his name to go before the convention for the nomination. After the campaign was over, which had resulted in the election of William McKinley as president and the election of General James A. Walker as congressman from the 9th district., the friends of Judge Alderson rallied to him to a man for the appointment as district attorney. He was opposed by Hon. D. F. Bailey, of Bristol; Hon. J. L. Gleaves, of Wytheville; Hon. Warren S. Lurty, of Rockingham county, and Hon. J. Hampton Hoge, of Roanoke. The fight for the attorneyship and marshalship for the Western District of the state was long and fierce, several of the friends of the aspirants for the appointments having made their homes in Washington during the preceding year before the appointments were made. The long contest was ended by the appointment of Judge Alderson as district attorney, and S. Brown as marshal. Judge Alderson, pending confirmation by the senate, received a temporary commission from Attorney General McKenna, and participated in his first term of court at Danville. His appointment was confirmed by the senate afterwards. His four years of service from 1897 to 1901, was conducted in a manner pleasing to the Dept. of Justice and with much credit to himself. At the end of his term, he resumed the practice of law in Wise County, with his son, under the firm name of Alderson & Alderson, until the death of his son, when he formed a partnership in law with A. N. Kilgore, under the style of Alderson & Kilgore, which continued until Judge Alderson retired from the practice. (See Note !)

Sir Edward Hall Alderson (baptised 10 September 1787 – 27 January 1857) was an English lawyer and judge whose many judgments on commercial law helped to shape the emerging British capitalism of the Victorian era.[1] He was a Baron of the Exchequer and so held the honorary title Baron Alderson, in print Alderson, B. Born Great Yarmouth, Alderson was the eldest son of Robert (died 1833), a barrister and recorder, and Elizabeth née Hurry who died in 1791. Alderson suffered an unstable childhood, variously living with relatives, unhappily attending Charterhouse School but, more positively, being tutored by Edward Maltby.[1] He was an able student of mathematics and classics at Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, in 1809 graduating as senior wrangler, Smith's prizeman, and Chancellor's Gold Medallist. He was consequently elected fellow.[2]

A pupil of Joseph Chitty, Alderson was called to the bar in 1811 at the Inner Temple and began work on the northern circuit where he established a substantial practice. He joined with Richard Barnewall as a law reporter from 1817 to 1822. On 26 October 1823 he married Georgina Drewe (died 1871) and the couple had many children.[1]

An early indication of his abilities came in 1825 when he was instructed by opponents of the proposed Liverpool and Manchester Railway, principally the directors of the Bridgewater and Leeds and Liverpool Canals, as their counsel in the committee stage of the private bill needed to establish the railway. Alderson was to cross-examine George Stephenson on his designs for the railway and the surveys on which they were based. Alderson proved an able advocate and Stephenson a poor witness. Stephenson later confessed, "I was not long in the witness box before I began to wish for a hole to creep out at." Largely owing to Alderson's devastating closing speech, the bill was lost, the railway was delayed for several years and Stephenson's early reputation badly damaged.[3] However, Alderson sought neither the title of a QC nor a seat in Parliament. Despite his lack of the outward trappings of ambition, he was appointed to the Common Law Commission in 1828 and a judge of the Court of Common Pleas in 1830, with the attendant knighthood. He became a "Baron" of the Court of Exchequer in 1834 and transferred to the Court of Chancery in 1841. He was an advocate of the plasticity of the common law in adapting to the changing times. According to Hedley, he was popular and jocular, a "clever, analytical, and forthright judge, with little patience for those of lesser abilities".[1]

Personality and family:

Though, as a criminal judge at the assizes, he was instrumental in suppressing the Luddites and Chartists, he believed that rehabilitation was the principal goal of sentencing. He was dubious of the effects of deterrence and argued for the limitation of capital punishment, himself seeking to disapply it, by whatever technical means he could creatively devise.[1]

An active member of the Church of England and a close friend of Bishop of London Charles James Blomfield, Alderson supported the Gorham judgment which held that the Church was subject to secular law. He was a noted advocate of affirmation as an alternative to the oath for witnesses but opposed the growing contemporary campaign for secular education. Hedley describes Alderson as a "Conservative... suspicious of the 'tyranny' he saw in democracy".[1]

Alderson established homes in London and Lowestoft where he wrote poetry, in English and Latin, and corresponded with his cousin, novelist Amelia Opie.[1] He was also an enthusiastic and knowledgeable follower of horse racing.[4]

While sitting at Liverpool assizes in December 1856, he heard of a serious injury to one of his sons and collapsed. He died the following January at his London home from a brain disease. He was buried at St Mary Magdalen's Church, Risby, near Bury St Edmunds.[1] Alderson's daughter Georgina Charlotte married British statesman, Robert Gascoyne-Cecil, 3rd Marquess of Salisbury in 1857. Salisbury's father, James Gascoyne-Cecil, 2nd Marquess of Salisbury, opposed the marriage owing to Georgina's lack of wealth and social standing.[5]
